

Olera Family Host Agreement

Letting someone help with the person you love is the hardest trust there is. The students you'll meet through Olera chose caregiving because it's their calling — they show up because it matters to their future and because your parent matters now. You give them a real beginning; they give your family attentive, present care. And the parts that are new to you — being the employer, doing it safely — you won't figure out alone.

— Dr. Logan DuBose, MD

This agreement is between you (the Family Host) and Olera. It explains your role when you host an Olera intern in your home, what you commit to, and how we support you. It is the source of truth for hosting. There is no fee to you.

1. What hosting is. You bring on an Olera intern — a vetted pre-health student — to help care for your family member.

2. You are the employer. Because the care happens in your home and under your direction, you are the household employer: you set the schedule, pay, and supervision. This isn't a technicality — the person directing the care is rightly the one responsible for it.

You hold this role because it's truly yours.

3. We help you do it safely. Being a household employer — and handling liability and insurance — has real nuances, and it can be done simply and safely with the right documentation. You get our Quick-Start Household-Employer Guide and a 30-minute consultation with our team, so you're never figuring it out alone.

4. Pay. You and your intern agree on pay. Olera may help you process payment — a convenience that does not make Olera the employer.

5. Liability and insurance. Because you control the home and the care setting, liability and insurance are yours; Olera carries none. (The guide and consultation above are there to help you cover this properly.)

6. Your role in the internship — short, and meaningful. Verify your intern's hours honestly, leave a brief review after shifts, and — if your intern asks and you feel they earned it — consider writing a letter of recommendation (we'll give you a summary of their work and a ready template) and serving as a reference.

Your honest word can launch a future nurse or doctor. It costs nothing and may mean everything.

7. Good faith. Keep the availability you agree to, barring emergencies, and treat your intern as the professional-in-training they are.

8. What Olera is, and isn't. Olera connects you with vetted students and structures the internship. Olera is not the employer, an insurer, or a guarantor. What you get is a motivated caregiver — and our help being a confident, safe employer — at no cost.

9. After the internship. If it's a good fit, you're encouraged to keep your caregiver on for the long term, using Olera however helps.

10. Accepting. You accept by signing electronically when you send your intern an offer. We record who accepted and when; updates require re-acknowledgment.
